> [Now First Published.] CHAPTER XXII.

The next few days were almost intolerably bit ter and degrading to Lady Ennismore. She was in the toils and she could not cecape, and the miserable little wretch Tommy Twiss held her fast. He would be naid for his silence, and he made his wife tell Lady Ennismore this which the poor woman did with shan a and many tears." and the foolish tender love which she had unreed in her heart so long for Tonmy certainly at this time began to wans. At last after much bargaining Tommy agreed to accept five hundred a year from Lady Ennismore for holding his tongue regarding her early life. She was a very rich woman, but even to a rich woman to pay away fifteen hundred a year without the knowledge of her husband is a serious consideration. But Lady Ennismore did this. She privately sold some of her solendid iewels. and told Lord Ennismore she felt too ill to go through the fatigue of a London season. Thus early in June they quitted town, and by Lady Ennismore's wish returned to Brackenford. She felt safer in the country, she thought; further away from the chance of again looking on the face which had cost her so dear. It chanced to be a beautiful summer, and some sort of peace stole back to her heart amid the wild hills she had loved so well. But every one noticed that Lady Eunismore was great! changed. She had grown nervous, and had a strange look of fear sometimes, when the remembrance of the haunting shadow of 'the past rose before her. Still she believed she had purchased Roche's silence, and that he would be content never to advance any further claims. In the meanwhile, as the bright summer days glided on, Miss Sinclair was doing her best to win from the gentle lips of the rector some declaration of the feelings of his heart. But the Reverend Leter still was silent. Here was a man crushing unselfish'y back the one arten wish of his life for the sake of the poor old faded a sters at home. During Miss Sinclair's absence in town how many a time bad Peter wandered alone in the gloaming thinking of her parting words. She would not forget she had a friend at Brackenford, she had said, and not many weeks after she put this to a practical proof, for she wrote to the rector, enclosing a five pound note, which she asked him, as a great favour, to distribute between two poor sick women in the village, whom she felt much sympathy for. "Dear Mr. Prescott," (read the rector, holding the clear finely-written lines in his tr mbling hand) "I am going to ask you if you will be so very good as to give the enclosed money to poor Mrs. Prichard and Mrs. James? I felt so sorry for these two unfortunate woman when I came away but just then'l was too poor to help them. Now, however, I have received my salary and can afford to spare the trifle I send, especially as I spend very little while we are in town, as J do not care for gaiety at all. I send the money to you because you know we promised to be friends always before I left Brackenford, and talking, and never saw-Ludy-Ennismore until she "Then do you want to keep the puppy, this thought is very pleasant to me, and now I am taking advantage of our compact by asking you this great favour. I for one am longing once more to see the heathere hills, and I remain, with kindest regards, yours very sincerely,

"C. Sinclair." What it cost Miss Sinclair to part with that five pound note no one can imagine! She was very fond of money, and to send it away to two old women, was absolutely heroic on her part But she knew it was likely to draw the rector nearer to her, for the Rev. Peter was a man of much charity, and his sisters used to declare that: Peter gave away far too much. She, therefore, sent it, and it had precisely the effect she intended. Poor Mrs. Prichard and poor Mrs. James each received the two pounds ten shillings intended for them, but Miss Sinclair's five pound note was not changed, but remained with her most precious possessions. And he wrote to thank her also, and altogethe after Miss Singlair received his letter she did not grudge the money quite so much to the two old women Thus, when she returned to Brackenford, in the shining summer days, she met the rector in very friendly fashion, and his misters began to tremble more than ever lest they couple of days in the hope of meeting you." and utter shame and heartbreak to herself and Ross," and address in full.
